Another Day In The Brain Laundry

If you can say that anything positive came out of the Chinese Virus it was this: with public schools on lockdown and lessons being sent home via the internet, parents all of a sudden got to see what the public schools were teaching their children. Many of the parents were, shall we say, less than thrilled.

Many parents were shocked to discover that Marxist aberrations like Critical Race Theory were being taught to their kids in lieu of real academics. This and other related issues woke parents up to the education games being played with and on their children.

I have seen, mostly on Fox News, where the leaders of some parent's groups are actually urging parents to abandon public schools and seek other educational alternatives for their kids. For a long time I wondered if I would ever see such in my lifetime anymore. Needless to say, I totally agree with this sentiment. I hope those promoting this viable option continue to do so.

I don't expect to see public schools emptied in my lifetime, but every youngster that is removed from their clutches is a victory for that student and his or her family.

There are so many alternatives to public schools available to parents now that many parents wanting to get their kids out of public schools can come up with some workable alternatives. I read awhile back that there are something like two million kids that are now being educated in a non-public school setting. That is surely something to rejoice over. All I can say is "Praise the Lord for this development."
